Achilla

THE HALF MOON, LONDON

THESE days, nobody walks into a virtually empty South London club for a mid-week gig and gets excited by a band near the bottom of the bill. Oh no? Meet Nobody.

Sally

London-based yet multi-national, Achilla arrive with no hype and even less expectation. Half an hour later, they've the small crowd spellbound. Musically balanced between Opeth and Nightwish (and with the talent to compete at that rarified level), the five-piece triumphantly even overcome the loss of bassist Matthew Grassi, quite literally, as they're about to go onstage (guitarist Charlie Cawood effortlessly switches), and the fact that keyboard player Diego Tejeida has injured his right hand. They've also got three absolute trumps. Guitarist Daniele Panza is an accomplished shredder. Songs like Hunter, Wild Flower and Inside A Lie are expansive, articulate yet memorable (they also do an impressive cover of My Angel, by cult '80s all-girl band Rock Goddess). And vocalist Marta has an unusual, affecting charisma. She's the stoned earth mother who entices and fascinates – an ingénue with a remarkably assured sensuality. [8]

ETHS

ETHS, a five-piece band from London, are a mix of metal and rock. They have a sound that is reminiscent of the early 2000s, but with a more modern edge. Their music is a blend of heavy metal and hard rock, with a focus on melody and groove. They have released several albums and have a growing fan base. Their sound is a mix of old-school metal and modern rock, with a focus on melody and groove. They have released several albums and have a growing fan base.
